A plasma source for these dry etch systems typically involves the placement of a reaction coil within a vacuum vessel containing the semiconductor wafer to be processed. The vacuum vessel contains a coil for producing a magnetic field for generating a plasma. Such a system is often referred to as a high density plasma source. The coil inside the vacuum vessel produces a magnetic field which acts on ions in the plasma. The ions are accelerated by this magnetic field toward the substrate being processed. The wafer can be mounted on a variety of substrates which are electrically biased to produce an electrical field between the substrate and the ions. In this way, the ions are accelerated to impinge on the wafer with enough kinetic energy to achieve a controllable process. After the plasma is established, i.e., after the plasma source is powered, a number of processing steps may be executed. These steps, depending on the process being implemented, can include ion cleaning and/or modification, ion acceleration, substrate biasing, scanning, etching, etc. Each step typically incorporates a number of control parameters, e.g., temperature, flow rate, pressure, power, etc., which are set to achieve a desired result. To ensure consistent processing and improve plasma performance, it is important that these control parameters be set to achieve a desired setpoint. One difficulty often encountered is that the process for achieving the desired setpoint can be highly nonlinear (i.e., it takes a very wide range of values to get the result sought). This difficulty can be especially acute when attempting to control parameters, such as source power, for plasma discharge. In the case of plasma discharge, for example, conventional control schemes typically employ an open-loop control scheme which simply attempts to operate a plasma with a fixed input power. In many cases
