Fatty acid-induced Ca^{2+} release from sea urchin eggs differs from previous mechanisms of Ca^{2+} signaling. In previous studies, it has been reported that fatty acids can induce Ca^{2+} release in eggs from sea urchins. In order to determine the mechanism by which such a response is elicited, we have attempted to identify the source of the Ca^{2+} that is released. Eggs from the sea urchin Lytechinus pictus and eggs from the sea star Patiria miniata were labelled with $^{45}\text{Ca}^{2+}$ or $^{37}\text{Ca}^{2+}$ and then exposed to olive oil or to corn oil at a concentration that induces a Ca^{2+} release response (10 microl/ml) in Patiria eggs. In eggs from the sea urchin Lytechinus pictus, we observed only marginal increases in Ca^{2+} levels in the cytoplasm and in the lipid droplets.

In contrast, in Patiria eggs, we observed a significant increase in the Ca^{2+} content in all of the fractions we examined. Most importantly, the response was accompanied by a net loss of Ca^{2+} from the intracellular stores. Our findings suggest that in Patiria eggs, the mechanism of Ca^{2+} release may be distinct from those previously documented for eggs from other species. Enhancing BMP-2-induced calcium phosphate formation in rat bone marrow MSCs cultured in a bi-continuous hydrogel system.

BMP-2-induced calcium phosphate (CaP) formation in osteoblasts is supported by in vitro studies using bone marrow-derived mesenchymal stem cells (MSCs). Several aspects of this effect, however, have not been reproduced in vivo. In the present study, we examined whether bi-continuous hydrogels can enhance BMP-2-induced CaP formation
